When working in the early stages of the site, I decided to deviate from my Figma design and stretch the background tree image to fit the entire page.

Feedback 1: "The site looks really cool, and I like the background image. But it's kind of grainy and distracting throughout the page.

After this was pointed out, I completely agreed, and went back to my original design, and just featured the image in the header.

When I added the contact form, I initially went with different colors. They were much brighter and mainly used light blues and white.

Feedback 2: "This contact form is really bright compared to the rest of the page. I like where you have it, I just feel like maybe it should be darker to match better."

This was a simple fix. I just went back into jotform and changed the overall color scheme to better fit the page.

Initially, the list of books was just a list of the titles.

Feedback 3: "I wish there was a little bit more information about the books. It's nice that you included the names, I'm just not sure if that's enough information to decide if I want to read them."

I decided to add links to each of the titles that will take the view to a new page with information dedicated to the books and the characters.
